Emphasis on protecting troops

Defence Minister John Faulkner has unveiled a $26.9 billion defence budget which devotes $2.6 billion to fund continuing operations in Afghanistan and buy equipment to better protect Australian troops deployed there.

* [Subscription required]

Faulkner under fire on projects

The Opposition has accused Defence Minister John Faulkner of condoning Navy's concealing figures on the availability of the Collins class submarines and overseeing the deferral of a further $1 billion in defence projects.

* [Subscription required]

---

Budget 2010-11: Strategic Reform Program to deliver $1 billion of cost-reductions in 2010-11, Media release, Department of Defence, 2010-05-11

Defence budget breakfast, National Press Club, ACT, Transcript, Department of Defence, 2010-0-

Citing threats of terrorism, the government will bolster border security by $1.2 billion, some of which will be spent in Indonesia to stop asylum seekers heading for Australian shores. The spending surge comes as the government comes under persistent attack over the rising number of unauthorised boats heading here.

- Pre-poll splurge on border protection, John Kerin, AFR+, 2010-05-12
  + [Subscription required]

Australia’s intelligence agencies may win far greater flexibility to use surveillance tools at home after an independent inquiry ordered by the Rudd government. An intelligence review, confirmed in the federal budget, is likely to examine strict limits on how agencies that have been set up to protect against foreign threats can operate in Australia.

A British nuclear risk expert has warned that terrorists could target radioactive waste being transported thousands of kilometres across Australia to a proposed waste dump in the Northern Territory.

The build-up of Australia's High Readiness Reserve of troops has been halted, with the Rudd government demanding a leaner, better-equipped and more capable force. While the Howard government saw the need for rapid expansion of the HRR to help with the war on terror and overseas deployments, Labor's policy of doing more with less in Defence will see the Reserves undergo sweeping changes.

President Obama promised President Hamid Karzai of Afghanistan that the United States would remain in Afghanistan for the long haul, even as he vowed to stick to his timetable to begin withdrawing troops by July 2011. Both men sought to play down the sharp differences between the governments over the past few months, as the White House pressed its new strategy of using carrots and kind words, instead of sticks and pressure, with Mr. Karzai.

Nearly a year into a new war strategy for Afghanistan, the hardest fighting is still ahead, but already it is clear that the biggest challenge lies not on the battlefield but in the governing of Afghanistan itself. The success of the far larger offensive in the coming weeks in Kandahar, the Taliban... heartland, may well depend on whether Afghans can overcome their corrosive distrust of President Hamid Karzai’s government.

- Governance in Afghanistan: looking ahead to what we leave behind, Colin Cookman and Caroline Wadhams, Center for American Progress, 2010-05-12, [PDF, 1.0MB]

---

View this online at: https://nautilus.org/apsnet/apsnet-13-may-2010/

Nautilus Institute
2342 Shattuck Ave. #300, Berkeley, CA 94704 | Phone: (510) 423-0372 | Email: nautilus@nautilus.org