Notes:

- Diversity ranking takes into account both percentage of non-US authors and number of authors' countries included on a scale of 1 (least) to 10 (most).
- Countries were assigned based on national origin and national identification, rather than country of residence.
- Articles written by Nautilus staff were excluded from diversity ranking as we are interested to identify the diversity of network participants over time.
- In cases of multiple authors, only one country was counted. However, in cases of responses to PFO's, all individual respondents were included.

Country totals: US 78; Russia 26, ROK 26, UK 2, Canada 2, Japan 1, PRC 2, DPRK 8, Germany 1, Australia 7, South Asia 2, New Zealand 1, Philippines 2, East Timor 1.

ATTACHMENT 4: NORTH KOREA THROUGH AN AMERICAN PRISM: A LIST OF MYTHS CURRENTLY RECYCLED THROUGH THE MEDIA

Peter Hayes

December 19, 1993

In this memo, I list twenty three myths about about the nuclear standoff with North Korea that can be observed today in US media reporting, editorials, and oped analyses. Future versions of this note will expand on and track the evolution of these myths. Readers are invited to inform the author of other myths that have appeared in the public discourse about this dispute.

Much of the current coverage of the standoff in US mainstream press is based on leaks from bureaucratic forces contending for position or turf. With significant exceptions, most reporters are way behind the curve of actual US policy and the state of play of negotiations between Pyongyang and Washington. Mainstream print and electronic media regularly cite conservative pundits who favor either the rollback of the North Korean regime, or its containment based primarily on US military power.

In addition to tainted sources, North Korea's refusal to admit foreign journalists to cover events in North Korea or to even interview its own leadership is partly responsible for the high level of ignorance and prejudice to be found in American news coverage of the standoff.

The combination of these predominant myths with the ignorance of reporters about North Korea ensures that the US media primarily frame public opinion rather than inform it. The real news is missed--the fact that the US is talking with its archenemy; the terms of the pending deal with Pyongyang; and whether there should be a deal at all with North Korea.

As with all myths, they contain elements of truth. Often, it's what's left unsaid rather than what is spelled out that's crucial to undermining an effective public debate.

ABOUT NORTH KOREA

1. North Korea is the "single most dangerous problem in the world" (C. Krauthammer, "North Korea's Coming Bomb, It's Clinton's crisis, and he's not ready to lead," Washington Post, November 5, 1993, p. A27.)

2. North Korea's only goal is to get nuclear weapons.

3. North Korea has nuclear weapons now.

4. North Korea getting nuclear weapons would inevitably lead to South Korea and Japan following suit.

5. North Korea with nuclear weapons could spoil the security architecture of a Pacific Community built on diplomacy and economic interdependence rather than militarized alliances held over from the period of Cold War militant containment.

6. North Korea with nuclear weapons could severely damage the NPT extension/review conference in 1995.

7. North Korea will collapse soon ("implode").

variant: North Korea soon will collapse economically.

8. North Korea cannot change.

variant: North Korea's economic problems are all self-imposed due to its command-and-control economy and centralised, personalised polity.

9. North Korea can be starved into submission.
10. North Korea is politically and socially unstable.
11. North Korea can be bludgeoned into submission.
12. North Korea is poised to invade South Korea at a moment's notice and intends to do so continuously.
13. North Korea's leadership is (variously described) as erratic, irrational, crazy etc.
14. North Korea's leadership only understand the language of force.
15. North Korea has no legitimate security concerns to address with the United States.
16. North Korea's leader, Kim Jong Il, is insecure. The succession is incomplete.

ABOUT US POLICY RE NORTH KOREA

1. The US is using only carrots, no sticks.

variant: US sanctions for the last 40 years have not affected North Korea.

2. Talking to North Korea is a concession by the US.
3. The US has done nothing to slow the North Korean nuclear program.
4. The US can unilaterally impose sanctions against North Korea to effect.
5. The US has given away the store already.
6. The US has sold out its closest ally in Northeast Asia, South Korea.

variant: The US can act unilaterally and ignore what South Korea or Japan views or response.

7. The US response to North Korean first use of nuclear weapons would be to use nuclear weapons to annihilate North Korea.
