1. US-PRC Surveillance Talks

PRC Foreign Ministry spokeswoman Zhang Qiyue said on April 19 that after two days of negotiations regarding the ramming and destruction a Chinese fighter jet by a US reconnaissance plane, the two sides have agreed to keep in contact and resolve the issue through diplomatic channels. US State Department spokesman Charles Hunter said that the US on Friday gave the PRC its proposals for a special meeting on how to avoid conflict between PRC fighters and US surveillance planes.

The US-PRC spy plane controversy has bolstered the position of US policymakers advocating a tougher stance toward the PRC, but who fear that US President George Bush will acquiesce to business groups and moderate advisers from his father's administration.

US reconnaissance aircraft maintain a Cold War-high tempo of operations, argues military analyst William Arkin in the Washington Post.

US government sources said on Wednesday that the crew of the US EP-3 surveillance plane that made an emergency landing in the PRC had not been able to destroy as much of the secret materials on board as originally believed, and some of it could be exploited by the PRC.

2. Israeli Arms Transfers to PRC

US military analysts said that PRC fighter jets are equipped with weapons rooted in US technology and sent to the PRC via Israel. US weapons specialists said that a study of PRC air-and land-based missiles reveal that their missile capabilities could not have reached full potential without US know-how.

3. US Protection of Taiwan

Sino-US tensions over Taiwan rose again on Wednesday when, in a series of interviews with news organizations to mark his 100th day in office, US President George W. Bush declared that the US would do "whatever it took to help Taiwan defend herself" and said the deployment of US troops is "certainly an option" if the PRC were to invade the island. Bush quickly sought to correct any impression that the remarks constitute a departure from long-standing US policy to be deliberately vague on how the US would help Taiwan.

4. US Arms Sales to Taiwan

US President George W. Bush has deferred selling Taiwan destroyers equipped with the Aegis combat-radar system but will offer four Kidd-class destroyers. The Kidd-class destroyers would be outfitted with an upgraded fleet-defense radar system and the cost of the entire arms sale package could amount to more than US$4 billion. US President George W. Bush said on Tuesday that he will stop the annual review of arms sales to Taiwan, ending a policy used by the US since 1982. The PRC and Taiwan reacted largely as expected Tuesday to the news of US arms sales to Taiwan. Analysts said that in fact, the arms offer is certain to bring Taiwan and the US militaries closer together, in order to integrate the relatively advanced weapons into the island's outdated force structure. For example, if Taiwan does choose to buy the eight diesel submarines included in the US offer, it will need to build an entire submarine warfare force and a base to hold it from almost scratch. Taiwanese military officers acknowledge that Taiwan's armed forces not only need weapons, they also need top-to-bottom reform.

European and US officials and experts said Thursday that the US failure to consult in advance with Germany or the Netherlands on its offer to sell Taiwan submarines using those countries' technology has irritated the two governments.

5. Responses to US Arms Sales: Taiwan, PRC

Taiwanese authorities adopted a low-profile response Tuesday to the reported arms sale approval. Foreign defense experts said that Taiwan already enjoys a net strategic advantage over the PRC, even though the PRC is trying to make up for it by pointing an increasing number of missiles at the island. Experts noted that the PRC's strongest card is its nuclear capability, but that advantage is mainly theoretical.

US State Department spokesman Philip Reeker said that PRC ambassador to the US Yang Jiechi on Tuesday lodged a formal diplomatic protest at US President George W. Bush's plans to sell arms to Taiwan. An editorial in the People's Liberation Army Daily, the PRC armed forces' mouthpiece, said, "Arms purchases can only make the Taiwan Straits situation more turbulent, increase the threat to regional peace and stability, and backfire." PRC analysts disagreed on whether US President George W. Bush's remarks on Taiwan represented a shift in US policy. Wu Xinbo, a professor at Fudan University's Center for American Studies in Shanghai, stated, "At this moment, it's very difficult to argue that there's still a high prospect for a peaceful solution of the Taiwan issue. I think Bush's remark and the decision on arms sales sends a signal to the PLA." Wu said, "I don't think individual incidents will cause a new cold war. In the larger picture of U.S.-China relations, the basic interests have not changed."

6. Commentary on US Arms Sales

US defense official said Thursday that the US could fight the PRC in defense of Taiwan using currently available military forces. The official said, "We don't train with the Taiwanese, and so there would be an issue there with types of standard operating procedures -- tactics, techniques and procedures, as we call it. But that's not to say we could not operate together."

"US Defense of Taiwan" (NAPSNet Daily Report, April 27, US)

Richard Fisher, a senior fellow at the Jamestown Foundation, said, "It's the most significant weapons package in a decade. And it will give cause to yet another crisis in Sino-US relations." Kenneth Lieberthal, Asia director of former President Bill Clinton's National Security Council, argued, "This is one of those things you can walk back partway but never completely, because it's part of the mind-set."

7. Lee Teng-hui's Japan Visit

After Japan decided to issue a visa for Lee Teng-hui, PRC Vice-Foreign Minister Wang Yi urgently met with Japanese Ambassador to the PRC Koreshige Anami and lodged protest with the Japan. Lee

Teng-hui returned to Taiwan on April 26 after undergoing medical tests and treatment during a five-day private visit to Japan.

PRC Parliament Chief Li Peng cancelled his trip to Japan next month in protest against former Taiwan President Lee Teng-hui's visit to Japan. In response to the PRC government's decision on April 25 to postpone Li Peng's visit to Japan, Japanese Chief Cabinet Secretary Yasuo Fukuda said to reporters, "It is a regret that he cannot come to Japan. I hope he will be able to visit as soon as possible. PRC Foreign Ministry spokesperson Zhu Bangzao criticized the US for granting permission for Lee Teng-hui to visit.

3. US Policy on Korean Peninsula

The PRC's Wenhui Daily stated that the Bush administration shelved the US engagement policy toward DPRK soon after assuming power. ROK Foreign Minister Han Seung-soo and Defense Minister Kim Dong-shin met Thursday with Evans Revere, charge d'affaires at the US Embassy in Seoul, and US Forces Korea Commander General Thomas Schwartz to ask the US to reopen dialogue with the DPRK. Representative Jang Sung-min of the Millennium Democratic Party (MDP) said in the letter "President George W. Bush's North Korea policy should be formulated in a way that will re-engage the North and resume stalled negotiations."

The Wall Street Journal carried an analytical article that said that frustration is mounting inside ROK President Kim Dae-jung's government that US President George W. Bush's Asia policies are undercutting ties between the DPRK and the ROK. A number of Kim's aides fear time is running out as Bush's advisers say they are still reviewing the merits of engaging the DPRK and Kim's term ends next year. ROK Foreign Minister Han Seung-soo on Thursday expressed his wish to the US for it to speed up its review of DPRK policy to clear up uncertainties hanging over inter-Korean relations.

5. EU-DPRK Relations

Swedish Prime Minister Goran Persson said Thursday that he and top European Union (EU) officials intend to express the international community's support for warmer ties between the two Koreas during their visit to the peninsula May 2-4. Persson added that they will also discuss the DPRK's missile program, economic reforms, human rights and foreign aid. The DPRK decided to allow a record contingent of 75 foreign journalists to enter into the country, a total of eight ROK reporters will cover the news on Swedish Prime Minister Goran Persson's trip to Pyongyang next week.

7. DPRK View of US-ROK Exercises

The DPRK denounced the ROK for staging a joint military exercise with the US, accusing the ROK of betraying the inter-Korean declaration. With the past five weeks of its anti-US campaigns contributing little to resuming dialogue with the US, the DPRK intensified its rhetoric against the US this week.

8. Inter-Korean Relations: Railway, Trade, Aid

The DPRK has yet to start mine clearance in its section of the demilitarized zone (DMZ), despite the ROK's completion of work in its section. However, Koh Dong-choon, head of the Korea National Railroad's project team, said that there were no mines in the civil control area north of the DMZ and that the DPRK would complete their construction faster than the ROK. ROK Unification Minister Lim Dong-won told a committee at the National Assembly on Friday that it would be hard to relink a railway between the DPRK and the ROK this year.

3. Foreign Policy

Newly elected Japanese Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi announced that Makiko Tanaka would become the country's first female foreign minister. Tanaka said on April 26 that Japan should avoid actions that could lead to deterioration in ties between Taiwan and the PRC, an apparent reference to Japan's approval of a visit by former Taiwan President Lee Teng-hui. Tanaka also said that Japan should continue seeking the return of all four disputed islands off Hokkaido in bilateral territorial talks with Russia.

1. India Satellite Launch

India conducted a successful test launch of its satellite rocket Geo-synchronous Satellite Launch Vehicle (GSLV-D1) and put an experimental satellite payload of 3,000 pounds into orbit. Defense experts say India's space program could also serve as a platform to test a wide range of military technologies, including missiles capable of carrying nuclear warheads. Russia's state-owned Space Scientific Production Center stated that it would provide India with five 12KRB blocks for use in their GLSV carrier rockets.

1. Russian MD Proposal

Russian first deputy head of the general staff, Colonel-General Valery Manilov, stated that Russia's proposed system could be deployed in various theaters all over the world, where any threat was thought to exist. Russian Defense Minister Sergei Ivanov said, "The new U.S. administration needs to define its approach" to missile defense, adding that the current US proposal remained unclear. In a report for the Russian National Press Institute on the proposed US National Missile Defense (NMD) program, Mikhail Pogorely states that the US had been behind the Soviet Union, and now Russia, in developing strategic defenses, but that Russia also regards ballistic missile defense firstly from a political and then from a military and strategic point of view.
