SECURITY PRAGMATICS FOR THE KOREAN PENINSULA

Despite the trend toward distanciating Cold War culture since the late 1990s, North and South Korea have been trapped in a vicious cycle of mutual distrust, negotiation, and protracted military confrontation. However, the perception that the Korean peninsula is in perpetuity a security “elephant in the room” has dramatically changed in recent years. North Korea’s new leadership under Kim Jong-un has created new hope for peace and stability on the Korean peninsula. Although the historic summit was instrumental for revising and expanding economic, social, and cultural exchanges between the two nations, it failed to produce concrete outcomes or new momentum for comprehensive cooperation. In this context, the current inter-Korean peace agreement has become the fulcrum for improving bilateral relations and promoting peace and stability on the Korean peninsula.

The June Summit Agreement

The June Summit agreement envisions a new trajectory for peace on the Korean peninsula. Seoul’s efforts toward national unification have been met with increasing force on the North side. For example, North Korea has conducted a series of missile tests and nuclear weapons experiments, increasing regional tensions and destabilizing the security situation. Given this context, the following paper will analyze the latest developments in inter-Korean relations and provide recommendations for future policy-making.

The June Summit Agreement provides a platform for peace and cooperation in the Korean Peninsula. It offers a new model for addressing the Korean Peninsula’s security issues and lays the groundwork for a peaceful future on the peninsula. However, it is important to note that the June Summit Agreement is not a panacea for resolving all of the issues on the Korean Peninsula. Nevertheless, it represents a significant step forward in the effort to achieve peace and stability on the Korean Peninsula.
